

LIFESTYLES

'The Reader' is an emotionally distant film

SPORTS

Tide starts tough SEC roadtrip tonight

The Crimson White

Wednesday, January 14, 2009

Serving the University of Alabama since 1894

Vol. 11

Smokers say 'No' to restrictions

By Danielle Drago
Senior Staff Reporter

At least 43 colleges around the nation have banned smoking on campus according to the Americans for Non-Smokers' Rights Web site, and some are eyeing the University as the 44th.

"Other campuses have gone tobacco-free, and this would be my personal preference for UA," said Margaret Garner, director of the Department of Health Promotion and Wellness at the Student Health Center.

Many steps have been taken to limit smoking around campus. The first step was the policy to ban smoking inside a 30-foot perimeter to entranceways of buildings. This step was supported by the SGA, Faculty Senate and the Professional Staff Assembly within the past two years, according to Garner.

Some say, however, these restrictions are not enough.

"A few baby steps toward discouraging smoking have been taken by UA, such as trying to move smoking a certain number of feet away from building entrances, a policy that has been largely ignored and unenforced, as any visit to Gorgas or Ferguson will attest," said Dr. Alan Blum, director of the Center for the Study of Tobacco and Society.

"The University is way behind. It is probably either dead last in the SEC or among the lowest ranking

CW | Marion R Walding

The University has imposed a smoking ban within 30 feet of entranceways.

universities in the SEC for progressive policies on smoking. A ban [on smoking] is

See SMOKE, page 2

Missing Art Contest judges Amanda Barnes and Jim Morrison look at a piece of art Tuesday afternoon at the Bama Theatre. The winners of the contest will be announced at 6 at the Bama Theatre.

Missing Art Contest held tonight at Bama

By Kelsey Stein
Senior Lifestyles Reporter

UA students submitted a total of 42 pieces of artwork to The Missing Art Contest, which culminates tonight with a showcase of all artwork at the Bama Theatre.

The showcase will take place tonight from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m. and is sponsored by The Missing Ink, a Creative Campus Initiative publication that endeavors to increase awareness of the arts among UA students. The Missing Ink's Web site, uamissingink.com, describes the publication as "UA's official unofficial online arts magazine."

"The main reason we're having this event to promote The Missing Ink features student artwork on the Web site. Stephanie Summer, chief of the publication, is a senior majoring in

The showcase

See ART, page 3

Smoking bans

Smoking laws by state, as of Jan. 4:

- All workplaces, restaurants and bars are 100% smoke-free
- One or two of these locations are 100% smoke-free
W = Workplaces
R = Restaurants
B = Bars
- No location is 100% smoke-free

Source: American Nonsmokers' Rights Foundation
Graphic: Chicago Tribune

UA students study abroad in Cuba

By Jessie Gable
Staff Reporter

This semester, for the first time in the University's history, a group of students will go to Havana, Cuba, for a study abroad program. Under Michael Schnepf, director of Alabama in Cuba and Spanish professor at the University, 11 undergraduate students will be spending three and a half months studying at the University of Havana.

The University already had a license to be in Cuba, Schnepf said, and programs are already established in book and document preservation, archeology and water purification.

All of the students are undergraduates who are either majoring or minoring in Spanish, Schnepf said, and each student will

See CUBA, page 3

NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTIONS | PART ONE

Healthy eating, weight loss popular vo

Editor's Note: This is the first of a four part series examining several common new year's resolutions and tips on keeping them.

By Josh Veazey
Senior Staff Reporter

Students looking to lose weight in 2009 can find help in nutritional advice from the Student Recreational Center and Student Health Center.

Lori Greene, the dietitian for the Student Health Center, identified several challenges college students often face in trying to lose weight and eat healthier, including lack of money, lack of time and lack of cooking equipment.

"I think a lot of people either don't know how to cook, or they don't have the time to cook or they don't have the money to buy the things to cook healthier meals," Greene said. "Which leads to eating out more, or eating in the dining halls and choosing the wrong thing."

Greene said large dining halls usually offer healthy alternatives, but it can still be a battle of wills to eat right when everything is right in front of you and it is all-you-can-eat.

Healthy eating tips

- Dietitians are available at the Student Health Center
- Drink plenty of water and don't skip meals
- Keep a journal tracking food eaten and progress

"I always tell people that I think it's good that they don't have trays anymore — so you can only carry one plate at a time," Greene said. "So just get one entrée plate — maybe salad or something on the side, but only one entrée. A lot of times people go to an all-you-can-eat and get two, three, four entrée plates, and you don't typically do that when you're sitting down at a meal at home."

Jessica-Lauren, a dietitian for the Student Health Center and a graduate student in health education, suggested journaling to make improvements.

"Maybe the first time you decide that you're going to eat one more fruit a day, you try to do that for six days out of the month, then the next week you try to do two fruits a day," Roberts said. "If we write it down, it really does make sense. It's like, and we change."

Roberts also said snacking when hungry, and drinking water to curb appetite.

See HEALTH, page 5

SMOKE

Continued from page 1

inevitable at UA, not only because of growing recognition of the harmful effects of second-hand smoke but also because of the damage to life and property from cigarette-caused fires," he said.

However, taking the restrictions further could cause tension on campus.

"I would drop out and move to a different school if I weren't allowed to smoke," said Brien Horn, a freshman majoring in business management.

"People would just keep smoking," said Seth Key, a senior majoring in history.

"What are they going to do if we smoke a cigarette?" Horn said. "It's America, let us do what we want."

"I think [a campus-wide smoking ban] would never work. Not only do students smoke, but many of the teachers smoke. I'm sure the administration won't want to piss them off," said Jamie Broday, a junior majoring in criminal justice. "The only ban that actually could work has already happened, which is the banning of smoking in restaurants. That ban I agree with because though I'm a smoker myself, I hate when someone is smoking around me as I eat, so I like to have the same respect for non-smokers."

Some students even said they wanted to see a potential ban fail.

"I would love for them to go as far as they can with [a ban on smoking], because it's just going to get shut down. There's no way that can happen, they can't do that," said P.J. Langdon, a freshman majoring in computer science.

Progress from anti-smoking campaigns is being made despite controversy.

"The most exciting progress I've seen on this campus is the interest on the part of more and more employees, notably in stopping smoking, and I have been leading small group discussions over in facilities in which we share tips for stopping and helping one another to do so," said Blum.

Smokers said they already faced discrimination for their choice of habit.

"Sometimes you get the look, but you know, f--- you, it's my body," Key said.

"I've gotten the meanest looks ever by just sitting [outside of Riverside West dorm], even when we're on the side and put our cigarette butts out, people give us looks. Sometimes people just say something like 'don't smoke in front of the door', but there's a smoking sign right outside," said Langdon, gesturing to a large sign displaying a smoking cigarette only two feet from the door to the building.

"If there was a no smoking sign outside, we would [follow the rule], but there isn't," he said.

Quick Facts

- Approximately 30 percent of college students are current tobacco users, according to the Harvard College Alcohol Study.

- Almost 40 percent of college students either began smoking or became regular smokers after starting college, according to the study.

- Research supports that if young adults are prevented from starting to smoke through the age of 21 the chances they will pick the habit up are very slim.

Even non-smokers said they would not support further restrictions on smoking.

"I'm fine if people smoke. I can't complain. If people are blowing secondhand smoke into my face then I just walk away," said Wade Houston, a freshman majoring in political science, who does not smoke.

"I think that's ridiculous because people have nicotine addictions that they need to take care of. I don't but I understand people in that situation. I think that's unfair to them. I am proud of the fact that you can be around people who smoke cigarettes and just let them be," said Houston.

The Student Health Center provides resources for those who smoke or struggle with nicotine addictions.

For those that are bothered by the prevalence of smoking on campus, politeness is key, said Delynn Wilcox, assistant director of Health Planning and Prevention.

"Students can respectfully ask that someone not smoke around them. On campus, students can politely remind others of the policy which prohibits smoking within 30 feet of the entrances to buildings," Wilcox said.

It is estimated that approximately 30 percent of college students are current tobacco users, according to the Harvard College Alcohol Study. Almost 40 percent of college students either began smoking or became regular smokers after starting college, according to the study. Smokers pointed to the daily grind of college life as a catalyst for their addiction.

"College life is too stressful," said Neal Clark, a freshman majoring in pre-law. "If some people smoke, then they smoke. That's how they make it through the day."

Research supports that if young adults are prevented from starting to smoke through the age of 21 the chances that they will pick the habit up are very slim. Institutions of higher education are unique in that they can develop prevention messages for this age group more easily than other communities. As a result, the Tobacco Strategic Health Team will be developing efforts directed at the freshmen and sophomore students to prevent them from starting to smoke, Wilcox said.

Restrictions may also be hin-prevent them from starting to smoke, Wilcox said.

Restrictions may also be hindered from progressing because of a relationship between the Career Center and Phillip Morris, Blum said.

The world's leading cigarette manufacturer is present at many job fairs on campus and gives money to the University and is considered a valued employer of UA students, according to Blum.

"[UA is] the only university in Alabama that has this kind of relationship with a cigarette company. It's shameful," Blum said.

Whether more restrictions are put into place, the health of students is the most important thing according to the Center for the Study of Tobacco and Society.

"This has nothing to do with passing legislation or enforcing a ban, it has to do with understanding that healthcare is very expensive and that most college students are in good health, it doesn't mean that they aren't beginning to pave the way toward bad health while they are in college. I think it is an act of maturity to forgo cigarette smoking on this campus and it's an act of respect for other people too," Blum said.

SALE

men's and ladies

vineyard vines® martha's vineyard

leona

Suits • Sportcoats • Slacks

The SHIRT SHOP

Mon. - Fri. 7-6pm
Sat. 9-5pm
downtown
752-6931
525 Greensboro Ave.

10062

theshirtshop.biz

Don't let this be you with the flu!

OPINIONS

Wednesday, January 14, 2009

Paul Thompson • Editor

paul.thompson@cw.ua.edu

OUR VIEW

Smoking ban could alienate students

Cigarettes are the only context in which you can mention camels and lung cancer in the same sentence (we promise this isn't the set up to some bad punch line.) The correlation being made is one we have all been around since the first grade: smoking is bad.

We, smokers and non-smokers alike, can all agree on the adverse health affects the general of all surgeons has been warning us about for more than 60 years. The controversy is what to do about it. In the last few years anti-smoking advocates have been pressuring local and state governments to ban smoking in public, and that pressure has been paying off to a certain extent.

Now that debate has made itself at home on our lovely campus, complicated by the fact that some of us are just as obsessed with nicotine as we are with tradition.

Where the editorial board disagrees is what to do about the problem. A large majority feels that smoking is every American's right, and the University should stay out of the discussion, especially if the sentiment is bent toward banning smoking on campus altogether.

We fear that banning smoking on campus will have the opposite effect it is intended to. By banning smoking, we wonder what will be done to those who break the rule. We don't disagree vehemently with the current policy of keeping smokers 30 feet away from building entrances, but an all out ban feels a bit discriminatory to most of us.

While we again acknowledge the harmful effects of smoking, it is every person's right to make that choice for themselves. By banning smoking on campus, University administrators would alienate numerous students and faculty members, potentially causing them to leave, which would make moot the Student Health Center's goal of protecting students from the illnesses caused by secondhand smoke. With fewer students to cater to in such a way, what would be the point in the first place?

CW News Editor Dave Folk contributed to this editorial.

Our View is the consensus of The Crimson White's editorial board.

Speak without stumbling

Lately I have become more critical of prominent, educated women. I think the reason I have begun to study and critique them is because I am currently preparing myself to enter the workforce. I've been worrying about internships and my career and life after college, as are most other upperclassmen.

I've started looking to the prime examples the media sets for us. Last week I wrote about the wretched Ann Coulter and her disgusting opinions. This week I figured I would jump over to the other side of the political spectrum and criticize Caroline Kennedy. Maybe now a few of you Republicans can get off my back about not questioning "my own kind." Believe it or not, I can criticize liberals, too.

Before I criticize her though, I have to acknowledge that Kennedy is an intelligent, educated woman. She graduated from Harvard University, as well as Columbia Law School. She is even being considered for the U.S. Senate seat Hillary

Jessie Landon

Clinton will leave empty when she becomes Barack Obama's secretary of state. Not to mention Kennedy has been married for 22 years and is the mother of three children. She seems to me to be an incredible role model for young women across the country.

This is why it kills me to hear about a recent interview Kennedy did with Nicholas Confessore and David M. Halbfinger of The New York Times, in which Kennedy used the phrase "you know" more than 135 times. I personally looked up the transcript of this interview and counted the amount of "you knows." I counted 144 "you knows," but it is reported that it was only 138. Either way, this is not a good thing for Caroline Kennedy. Actually, it is rather embarrassing for anyone who considers themselves to be well-educated. Most of Caroline Kennedy's actions and experience make her an incredible role model, but she has to clean up her act.

It has always been a pet peeve of mine when people overuse the words "like" and "you know" and "um." It gets under my skin when that one annoying girl walks into class everyday, screaming into her cell phone using "like" and "um" in between every other word. You all know who I'm talking about. When you watch ridiculous shows like MTV's "Sweet Sixteen," the most commonly used words on that show besides "gimme" are "like" and "um." Do any of you want to look ridiculous like those spoiled brats? No, I don't believe anyone who reads this paper wants to sound like that.

I suppose v... ing is that w... at the Univer... education, so... act like it? I f... who cannot fo... sentences with... and using "li... make it very d... themselves ta... Someone else... your dream jo... sounded mor... because they d... and "um" exce... feel that our... tion could use... lary cleansing... ther always g... grandchildren... for talking too... ing "like" too... we all need to... and take some... about what we... For those of... searching for... or jobs, good... language is no... you're going to Jessie Landon majoring in journalism. This column runs on...

BLUR The Washington Examiner

MCT Campus

Today, the greatest fear is fear itself

The news these days plays out like the plot to countless dystopian films and novels: two long-standing enemies are fighting again. One launched an unprovoked attack, the other responded with the typical bloody reciprocation. Today, the fighting is between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, tomorrow it could be Russia and Chechnya or nuclear pow-own self-interest and logic. Describing how Big Brother uses fear and nationalism in 1984, George Orwell asserts "the heretic, the enemy of society, will always be there, so that he can be defeated and humiliated over again."

There are many motivations for authoritarians to use fear to maintain a state of perpetual war. A warning against of the military-industrial complex, as vice president.

Of course, Vice President Dick Cheney, Israeli Defense Minister Ehud Barak and others like them are not the only ones benefiting from constant war built on intimidation. Their very enemies are built on the idea that they are constantly under attack. Were it not for fear-mongering,

Countless voters in the United States and throughout the world vote based on who they feel would make them safer, not who would protect their rights. Many divide the world into "us versus them," an ideology ironically rejected by former Bush Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. The idea that the enemy is completely evil and the ally perfectly good,

Take off your gloves

By Wesley

Kid gloves are the hands of cold weather. To handle certain or figures with tioned gloves. the act of editing manner that w as harsh or d I define it as a that writers pu more amiable to defensible opin

With the President George many seem to trap. Take Ian from Monday. I "Safire's Politic his thesis w example of "I kid gloves." H stated "George be remembered the history boo me a minute to back on after re admitted Bush should have ju allegiance to t Party with suc ment.

From the per Editor Dave Fo from the sarc down to the nu it." Sams does that I actualy but the deliver than a deep b Pennington. It worst I have e